This would be an excellent use case for the facade pattern. You could create an object that mediates between the user and database. This facade object would have simple getter and setter methods defined, that were easy for a user to use, and then ran the SQL calls accordingly. The facade could have adapters to adapt to multiple types of databases. This would make it so that, no matter the database, the user has a hassle-free experience getting and setting Employee data.